Overexpression of tyrosine kinases is common in malignant hematopoietic cells and results in activation of signal transduction cascades involving different phosphotyrosine-containing proteins. Chronic myeloid leukemia (CML) is characterized by a constitutively active BCR/ABL tyrosine kinase, which leads to increased tyrosine phosphorylation of a number of cellular proteins. We have studied the effect of imatinib (Gleevec, ST1571) on tyrosine phosphorylation in K562 cells, and demonstrated that imatinib caused a time- and dose-dependent inhibition of tyrosine kinase activity of BCR/ABL, as well as down-regulation of phosphorylation of the c-abl-associated tyrosine kinase substrates CRKL and Syk. In addition, imatinib reduced the total protein levels of both BCR/ABL and Syk in K562 cells. Despite the down-regulation of the total protein levels of BCR/ABL and Syk, the abundance of BCR/ABL and Syk was increased in the post-imatinib immunoprecipitation (IP) fraction compared with the pre-imatinib IP fraction. In contrast, the levels of another tyrosine kinase substrate, paxillin, were decreased in the post-imatinib IP fraction. The present data demonstrate a biphasic effect of imatinib on the abundance of the signaling proteins BCR/ABL and Syk, with an early decrease of the overall protein level of both kinases, followed by an increase in the immunop
