to be light, but, for the first time in years, the marriage counselor had made me feel I wasn't a fraud. Nanine worked for us. I was sorry when she left. Then I didn't miss her. She had always been a woman to admire. No one could take her beauty away from her, not even the psychos on Death Row. When David caught her in bed with another man, I assumed she would walk out on us. She couldn't stand that a man who had never worked a day in his life had so much money he could spend it on a car instead of food for his children. David was away on business a lot. I read him the letters, explaining Nanine's predicament, and when he had calmed down, he announced his intention to divorce her. It was the most horrible day in my life. For days afterwards I didn't do anything but read newspapers and take a lot of antidepressants. After David had been given a short sentence in the trial, Nanine and I made a solemn promise to get on with our lives. I never regretted my decision to forgive her. I looked at the girl's photo again. There were two words in English above her name, "she is beautiful". The words were next to a picture of a smiling woman with gray hair. I didn't read any more. The next day, there were two separate lines on my phone, Nanine and David. "Take him to jail." I rang and asked to speak to Nanine. "I have the papers to sign," she said, "get him out of our lives." "What papers?" "Divorce, divorce, divorce." David had insisted she divorce me. She had refused. Now, he had won. She could have said, "I
