Finally, the NCO transferase of R. glossinidius has a sequence identity of only 39% with that of the E. coli counterpart, which is much lower than that between the eukaryotic orthologs (81%). This is likely due to the limited potential and function of interdomain movements and consequent conformational changes, which are encoded by Ipo1 and characterized by a low secondary structure density, being the physiologically relevant structural intermediates difficult to produce and therefore rarely measured in crystallographic studies. The Tyr571 residue that forms an interdomain contact, of the E. coli Ipo1 model, is not conserved in the R. glossinidius protein; it is replaced by an alanine. This residue is a hinge residue in many N-terminal Ig-fold proteins and it has been shown that its replacement alters the inter 3da54e8ca3
