Anemia is the most common and challenging therapeutic problem in chronic lymphocytic leukaemia (CLL). It is often complicated by iron deficiency. We investigated the association between anemia and non-Hodgkin's lymphomas (NHL) in patients with CLL. The study population included patients with CLL, hospitalized in the Rheumatology Clinic of Federal

Is it fair to evaluate the software by using my own.Q: Simplest way to return a value from a child process How can I invoke a Go function from a child process that returns a specific value? I'm trying to do this, but it seems like it needs a pipe, yet Go only seems to allow me to pass a channel to a process, rather than returning a value. func fun(f int) bool { return f == 1 } func main() { cmd := exec.Command("echo", "1") var out io.Reader err := cmd.Start() cmd.Stdout = out err = cmd.Run() if err != nil { panic(err) } if fun(int(out.Read([]byte{0}))) == true { fmt.Println("exit from func fun", fun) } go func() { for { fmt.Println("child pid = ", os.ProcessID()) //wait for function to return value } }() } A: Is there a way to invoke a function that returns a value from a Go child process? There is no such way. You have two ways to accomplish what you want. The first is to use the provided interfaces, channels, and values that are provided by the io package. The second is to use the pipes provided by the syscall package (os/exec refers to this part of the Go standard library). This last one is the simplest. Specifically, let's implement a calculator as a function that takes two parameters, and returns their product. We will use a channel to communicate the result: package main import ("fmt" 3e33713323
