Softros messenger is a powerful instant messaging software which support instant messaging between users and group chat with multiple participants within a group on the same network. Sep 4, 2020 Softros LAN messenger 9.6.1.Q: Was the method of assigning tags proposed here used in the first place? In a recent answer to Can there be a difference between a "not a real question" close reason and a duplicate?, a method is proposed that looks quite similar to the way tags are assigned: the most common tag to which the question seems to fit should be assigned; if not, then this question should be closed as a duplicate That is, I would propose that the close reason "off-topic because it's a duplicate of [something else] should be changed to [not a real question]". If the question is closed as a duplicate of an "unanswered question", I would propose that "not a real question" should be used; if it is closed for any other reason, I would propose that "unclear what you're asking" should be used. Was this method ever used at all? If not, why was it not used? If so, why was it discarded? A: The issue isn't that the method of assigning tags doesn't exist, but rather that it doesn't exist in the current network and shouldn't be used at all. The current situation has a number of problems: Few tags are standardized; There's no way to consolidate a bunch of similar (but different!) questions; Many tags don't have an external/external link to a list of questions (well... at least, they don't have one that is easily found without going to the question itself); There's no simple way to go from the community's definition of the main question to the list of similar questions. I would suggest that it is very bad to propose such a modification to the reason that is currently on the page (since the network will be able to handle it perfectly well), especially if a different reason could be used instead. A: The way I have seen this used in the past is simply to close the question as off-topic. This usually leads to a discussion between the people who ask the question about what it is about and the people who are trying to
